Topic for Sunday, May 25, 1913-"Mission Work, at Home and Abroad. V. Industrial Missions." Acts, 18:1-6.

In the days when Robert Morrison went out single-handed to fight the battles of the Cross in China, and during the years of pioneering of Livingstone and Paten, and other fearless bearers of the Great Message to darkened lands, the idea of teaching the natives how to work and how to live natives how to work and how to live their homes on account of lack of accommodations. had not yet been seized upon by the missionary, but it was only in later years, in fact after the idea of medical missions, of which Livingstone himself was the first practical exponent, had been adopted as a reasonable means for winning the confidence of the heathen natives, that plans were promulgated and carried forward by the mission boards for introducing mio foreign mission work the industrial features which now form so large a part of the missionary propaganda in foreign fields. The natives are now taught how to work, and how to live clean, healthful, self-supporting lives, and then, without self-supporting lives, and then self-supporting lives are like and later progress in missionary work and in industrial instruction is reported.
